Have you ever gone to a playground or park to get a library book? Well, now you can do just that in Harlem, Georgia. Some very industrious students from North Harlem Elementary School, under the guidance of their teacher, Mrs. Kara Thacker, have made it possible to get books from The Little Free Library now located in Harlem community's park. The group of students were a part of a student educational module called SEM. This module is being utilized at schools all over the county.

The group researched and learned they could apply for a free one through the Little Free Library organization. Their next stop was to talk with City Hall in Harlem to see if they needed a permit and get a location approved. Many of the students and parents donated books for the little library. The way to use the library is to choose what you want to read and then return them (and others if possible). The library was officially opened last week with a ribbon-cutting and a lot of excitement. Mayor Bobby Culpepper of Harlem and Principal Kirk Wright of North Harlem Elementary School were in attendance.
